Rated 1 out of 5 by Milk from Not accurate I picked this level up to use when bending larger conduit to account for spring back. This level is not very accurate unfortunately. When getting near the end of my bend, I can visibly see that I just put a little more bend in but the level stays the same usually and sometimes it even says it has less degrees after I just watched it bend.

This may be platform specific, I somehow doubt it, but anyway, the best explanation I've seen is here on this msdn page where they explain about shutdown, linger options, socket closure and general connection termination sequences.. In summary, use shutdown to send a shutdown sequence at the TCP level and use close to free up the resources used by the socket data structures in your process.
