Jennifer Crusie and Bob Mayer are both well-known authors, each writing in different genres, and I enjoy reading each one. They joined together for "Don't Look Down" and overall their voices blended quite well. As for the plot and characterization, well, that's another thing. Lucy Armstrong makes a living directing dog food commercials in New York.

Don't Look Down: Chapter One - Jennifer Crusie

Don't Look Down is so atypical I had a rough time believing Crusie wrote it. The only reflection of her previous work I noted was the amusing struggle of 'self' exposed through the silent musings vs. the outward dialogue of both Wilder and Armstrong.

Jennifer does just fine on her own. why she thought she needed to collaborate I can't understand. Her books make me laugh out loud while I thoroughly enjoy her take on modern dating and life in general. I don't know anything about Bob Mayer's work and certainly am not going to look for it after reading "Don't Look Down."

I've just started Don't Look Down and was told the review was hysterical by Jennifer Echols. I've never read either Crusie or Mayer prior to DLD. Not yet two chapters into DLD, I am not loving the "let's introduce everyone on the first page" approach. I will certainly attempt to finish it, but my reading world won't end if I don't.
