Fish heads! Oft neglected in the culinary realm, there's a lot to see in the scientific one! The natural start is to look at the eye, which as students can see they don't have eyelids like us (no why would this be?) In the case of the milkfish, they have an adipose eyelid which is a transparent membrane over the eye. If you look directly into the center of the pupil, you can even see the lens ...

JAA likes peace and quiet at the waterside and is overly fond of float fishing with home-made quill floats and will fish anywhere for anything. JAA dislikes over stocked carp puddles. I nearly always float-fish, even when most sane folk have got out the ledger rod or gone home; some call this obsessive; I prefer 'dedicated'. I'm usually to be found in a quiet windward corner of the lake ...

Most birds cannot move their eyes, although there are exceptions, such as the great cormorant. Birds with eyes on the sides of their heads have a wide visual field, useful for detecting predators, while those with eyes on the front of their heads, such as owls, have binocular vision and can estimate distances when hunting. The American woodcock probably has the largest visual field of any bird ...
