In Latin and related languages, direct objects are usually marked with the accusative case, and indirect objects with the dative case. However, object marking may also follow non-syntactic rules, such as animacy. In Spanish, for example, human objects have to be marked by the preposition a (as an example of differential object marking).

Many grammarians would not call the to- version a true indirect object but rather "object of a preposition." They reserve the name "indirect object" for the "recipient" or "beneficiary" of a direct object. A "true" indirect object comes after the verb and before the direct object, as in "I wrote my father a letter."
